By the 1440s Vespasiano owned a bookshop in Florence patronized by members of the nobility. As a result, he was able to acquire a wide range of books and manuscripts. In 1450, he opened a new bookshop in Florence, which quickly became one of the most important in the city. He became known for his attention to detail and his ability to procure rare and valuable books. Vespasiano was also a keen collector of manuscripts, and his library was renowned for its quality and rarity.

Vespasiano was a close friend and patron of the renowned humanist and scholar Nicholas of Cusa, who was a regular visitor to his shop. Vespasiano also had a close relationship with the Medici family, who were powerful patrons of the arts and learning. He served as a bookseller to the Medici family, and his shop was a popular meeting place for scholars and artists.

Vespasiano was a prolific writer, and he produced a number of important works on the history and culture of Florence. His most famous work is the "Memoirs of the Lives of Illustrious Men of the XVth Century," which is a comprehensive record of the lives and activities of the most important men of his time.

Vespasiano was also a prominent figure in the cultural life of Florence, and he was a member of the Florentine Academy, which was a leading institution of learning in the city. He was also a patron of the arts, and he commissioned a number of important works of art, including a series of frescoes by the great Renaissance artist Filippo Lippi.

Vespasiano died in Florence in 1498, and his bookshop and library were left to his son, who continued to run them for many years. The Vespasiano Memoirs: Lives of Illustrious Men of the XVth Century remains a valuable resource for historians and scholars interested in the history of Florence and the Renaissance.
